COLLEGE STUDENT DONATES VIDEO GAMES TO CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL AFTER GOING BIG ON STOCKS

There's no doubting the fact that there are many kindhearted, generous, and truly exceptional people across the globe. Hunter Kahn, a Cornell University student, is one of them, as he's made a big donation to a children's hospital after winning in the stock market.

For those unfamiliar with the stock market, there was a major event recently in which people across the globe rallied together to invest in shares of the steadily dwindling GameStop company. They invested to punish hedge funds from shorting it, also allowing everyday people like Hunter Kahn to make significant sums of money from the situation.

Instead of simply indulging in his profits and spending them on himself, Hunter decided to give back. He did so by donating various games and consoles to the Minnesota Children's Hospital in Minneapolis, a gesture that the kids surely loved and are grateful for!

TODAY IN HISTORY

1926: Robert H. Goddard launches the first-ever liquid-fueled rocket, which traveled 56 meters.

1950: The first-ever National Book Awards were held.

INTERESTING FACT

The idea behind the stock market was first introduced in the Netherlands back in 1602 when the Dutch East India Company started issuing paper shares.
